Form and Abstraction

Satterfield's paintings are often described as abstract, but they are not entirely non-representational. His works often begin with recognizable forms, such as landscapes or figures, but these forms are gradually abstracted until they become unrecognizable. This process of abstraction allows Satterfield to explore the essential qualities of his subject matter, such as its shape, color, and texture.

In his painting "Untitled (Landscape)," for example, Satterfield depicts a landscape that is reduced to its most basic elements. The sky is a flat blue plane, the land is a series of green and brown lines, and the trees are represented by simple black shapes. This abstraction allows Satterfield to focus on the relationships between the different elements in the landscape, creating a composition that is both visually striking and emotionally resonant.

Color and Emotion

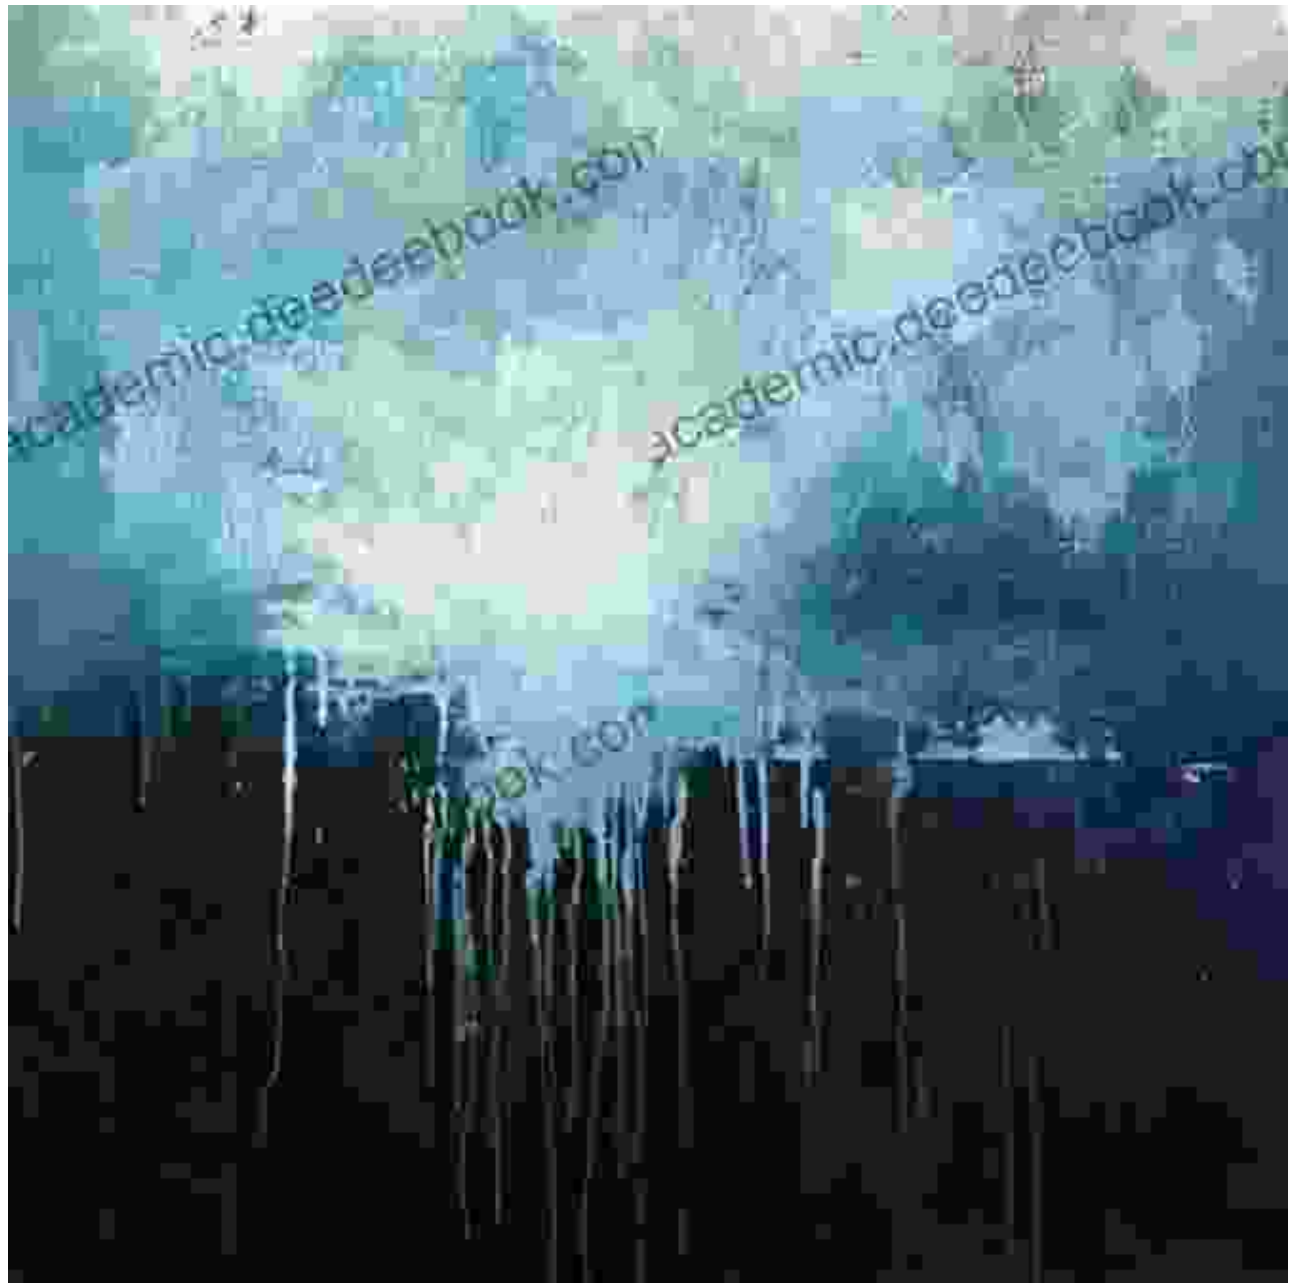

Color plays a vital role in Satterfield's paintings. He uses color to create a sense of mood and atmosphere, and to convey his own emotions and experiences. In his painting "Untitled (Red Room)," for example, Satterfield uses a deep red color to create a sense of intimacy and warmth. The red walls of the room seem to envelop the viewer, creating a feeling of safety and comfort.

In contrast, Satterfield's painting "Untitled (Blue Landscape)" uses a cool blue color to create a sense of distance and isolation. The blue sky and water seem to recede into the distance, creating a feeling of emptiness and loneliness.

Expressionism and the Subjective Experience

Satterfield's paintings are not simply representations of the external world. They are also expressions of his own inner thoughts and emotions. His work is often characterized by a sense of spontaneity and urgency, as if he is trying to capture a fleeting moment or convey a particular feeling. This expressionistic approach allows Satterfield to connect with viewers on a personal level, sharing his own experiences and emotions.

In his painting "Untitled (Self-Portrait)," for example, Satterfield uses bold brushstrokes and vibrant colors to create a self-portrait that is both introspective and revealing. The painting captures the artist's own sense of vulnerability and uncertainty, as well as his determination to express his own unique perspective on the world.
