The spectacle, according to Debord, is a "concentrated expression of the totality of social life" that is "at once present and absent, familiar and distant." It is a world that is mediated through images and representations, and it is this mediated world that becomes the primary reality for people. As a result, people come to believe that the images and representations that they see are the real world, and they lose sight of the true nature of their own lives.

Debord argues that the spectacle is a form of social control because it prevents people from seeing the real world and from understanding their own place in it. By controlling the images and representations that people see, the ruling class can control the way that people think and act. The spectacle creates a false sense of reality that prevents people from seeing the true nature of the world and from challenging the status quo.

The Revolt of the Spectacular Society has been influential in the development of the anti-elite movement, which seeks to challenge the power of the ruling class and create a more egalitarian society. The anti-elite movement has adopted Debord's critique of the spectacle and his belief that the spectacle is a form of social control. The movement seeks to raise awareness of the spectacle and to challenge the power of the ruling class by creating alternative forms of media and culture.
